

Biophilia explores the human relationship with nature, expressing our need to respect the bond between our existence and the natural world.

Biophilia is incorporated in this space through art, plants and water: Tillandsia plants - or air plants - which absorb their nutrients from the air; artwork in all workspaces that represents the natural world; lush green plants and the sound of moving water that emanates from the living wall gracing the reception area.

Sound

Loud noise is known to increase stress levels and reduce the ability to concentrate. To help diminish the impact of a noisy urban environment, a feature called sound masking has been implemented. The masking is essentially white noise - here, it sounds like air flow - and is present at low levels throughout the space. Even this small acoustic adjustment dramatically diminishes the impact of both street noise and office sounds.
