

Sirens of the Sonic Age Blog Hits the Internet

Connie J. Schlosberg's New Blog Provides News, Tours, Releases and Profiles of the Progressive Music Makers of Today

Colorado Springs, CO, August 18, 2007. Progressive music fans can now enjoy a place devoted to the music that inspires, moves and challenges both its listeners and creators at www.sonicsirens.wordpress.com. Writer Connie Schlosberg says the new blog was created out of her love for progressive music and a site to come read, listen and watch the latest happenings in the world of daring music and musicians.

"The goal of Sirens of the Sonic Age is to showcase new musicians who are creating a forefront in the area of progressive music," Schlosberg says. "This is a great way for bands to be discovered and gain some new following. Coverage of the latest news, releases and tours will keep everyone informed on what's going on with these artists and the masters who have been creating innovative music for years."

While much of the material on Sirens of the Sonic Age is within the rock music genre, the principles still apply to any music form or artist. "It's all about opening your mind to new ways of performing an ancient art. Music has been around forever, but finding unique ideas to expand its never-ending horizon is enriching for listeners and enduring for artists to develop and share their talents," Schlosberg says.

"Also, since I'm a music lover, I'll include videos and music streams of these artists featured," she adds. "Including pictures, videos and songs not only makes the site more enjoyable, it also helps some great indie acts get more exposure - which is what I want and fits the theme I'm going for."
